

Should I Send My Child to Camp?

The second chapter of Acts gives us insight into the early church and the way it gathered and interrelated. The Scripture tells us that the believers met together with glad and generous hearts, that they shared their possessions, that they ate together and worshiped together, and that they devoted themselves to the teaching of the apostles. Camp is a place where a community can duplicate the life of the early church.

Several realities dominate life at camp and make this setting an opportunity to discover love, generosity, commitment, patience, competence, and joy. At camp, people who are different can learn how they are alike; at camp, groups can work together to complete the initiative course or cook dinner; at camp, God is worshiped under the canopy of stars; at camp, questions about faith can be given the time and attention they need. At camp, biblical stories and faith are woven into everything that happens. At camp, a relationship with Christ's love and grace touches everyone.

Nancy Ferguson
reprinted from The Presbyterian Leader

Should I Send My Child to Camp?

The second chapter of Acts gives us insight into the early church and the way it gathered and interrelated. The Scripture tells us that the believers met together with glad and generous hearts, that they shared their possessions, that they ate together and worshiped together, and that they devoted themselves to the teaching of the apostles. Camp is a place where a community can duplicate the life of the early church.

Several realities dominate life at camp and make this setting an opportunity to discover love, generosity, commitment, patience, competence, and joy. At camp, people who are different can learn how they are alike; at camp, groups can work together to complete the initiative course or cook dinner; at camp, God is worshiped under the canopy of stars; at camp, questions about faith can be given the time and attention they need. At camp, biblical stories and faith are woven into everything that happens. At camp, a relationship with Christ's love and grace touches everyone.

Nancy Ferguson
reprinted from The Presbyterian Leader